Working with health care professionals is essential to studying how medicines work, including designing and learning more about medicines and treatment approaches through clinical trials both before and after a medicine is approved for use by patients.

Research is an ongoing process: Our work isn't done once a product is on the market. Health care professionals continue to perform crucial ongoing work to study the safety and efficacy of our medicines even after generic versions become available. We also work with outside investigators to study new uses for existing products.
